

YOUR GUIDE TO THE ENERGY CERTIFICATE

The energy certificate for your Spanish home

Every home that is sold or let in Spain needs an energy certificate. This guide explains what it is, who issues it and how to get it done from abroad.

INTRODUCTION

A label for how your home uses energy

The certificado de eficiencia energética rates a home from A, the most efficient, to G, the least. Buyers and tenants see the rating in every advert, so it shapes the first impression of your home.

The essentials at a glance

- You need a valid certificate before you advertise a home for sale or rent.
- It is issued by a qualified technician, usually an architect or engineer, after a visit.
- The certificate must be registered with your region before it is valid.
- It lasts ten years, or five years if the rating is G.
- The buyer or tenant receives a copy when the contract is signed.

Getting the certificate from abroad

You do not need to be in Spain. Someone with a key and a few documents is enough.

01 Book a qualified technician

Ask for a fixed price that includes the regional registration. Prices vary with the size of the home and the area.

02 Prepare the documents

The technician will usually ask for the cadastral reference, which is on your IBI bill, and any plans or details of the windows, heating and air conditioning.

03 Arrange the visit

The technician measures the rooms and checks the walls, windows and equipment. A neighbour, a key holder or your property manager can let them in.

04 Register and keep the label

Once registered, you receive the certificate and the energy label. Use the label in your adverts and keep the certificate with your property papers.

Small changes that make a difference

A better rating can make your home easier to let and more comfortable all year. These are the changes technicians most often suggest.

Windows and shutters

Double glazing and well-sealed frames keep the heat out in summer and in during winter.

Heating and cooling

A modern heat pump air conditioner uses far less energy than old units or electric heaters.

Hot water and solar

An efficient water heater, or solar panels on a house, can lift the rating by more than one letter.

Ask for a new certificate

After improvements, a new certificate shows the better rating straight away.
