INTRODUCTION

Put every contract in your own name

When you buy a home, the electricity, water and gas contracts often stay in the seller's name. Changing them to yours, the cambio de titular, means the bills, the deposits and the right to make changes are yours.

The essentials at a glance

- Every supplier will ask for your NIE, a Spanish IBAN and proof that you own the home.
- Electricity is identified by a CUPS code, which stays the same when you change supplier.
- Water is run by your town or its local company, so there is usually no choice of supplier.
- Part of the electricity bill depends on the power you contract, not on what you use.
- Paying every bill by direct debit keeps the home running while you are away.

What each supplier needs from you

Have these ready before you call or fill in a form, and the change usually goes through in a few days.

Your identity	Your NIE number and your passport.
The home	The deed of sale or a nota simple, and the cadastral reference from your IBI bill.
The supply	The CUPS code for electricity and gas, and the meter or contract number for water. All of them are on an old bill.
Payment	A Spanish IBAN for the direct debit.

Contracted power

Your electricity contract has a set power, the potencia contratada, measured in kW. You pay for it every day even when the home is empty, so a holiday home rarely needs the highest level. Your supplier can change it.

Lock up without surprises

A few minutes before you leave saves a lot of trouble while you are away.

01 Keep the electricity on

An alarm, a router or a fridge you leave running needs power. Switch off the circuits you do not need at the fuse box instead of cutting everything.

02 Close the water

Close the main water valve to avoid a leak while nobody is there. Check what your insurance says about water damage in an empty home.

03 Check your gas installation

Homes with piped gas get an official safety inspection every five years, arranged by the gas distributor. Make sure someone can let the inspector in.

EVERY FIVE YEARS

04 Keep the direct debits running

An unpaid bill can lead to the supply being cut. Keep every utility on direct debit from an account that always has money in it.
